

Allison Josal Shuba

Vice President, Fund Accounting

Goldman Sachs

Allison Josal Shuba is a Certified Public Accountant and Vice President of Fund Accounting at Goldman Sachs, where she leads financial reporting for multi-billion-dollar private equity investment funds. In this role, she manages a distributed team of accounting professionals and is responsible for the integrity of fund-level reporting, including net asset valuations, capital activity, and audited financial statements. She regularly partners with asset management, investment accounting, and audit teams to evaluate complex transactions, implement fair value accounting methodologies, and deliver performance insights that inform strategic decision-making and investor communications.

Prior to joining Goldman Sachs, Allison served as Assistant Controller at Mark Cuban Companies, where she oversaw treasury, compliance, and financial reporting across a diverse portfolio of more than 90 entities spanning industries such as technology, aviation, healthcare, and sports and entertainment. There, she acted as a key operational leader, driving system implementations, designing scalable processes, and improving departmental efficiency through automation and standardization initiatives. Earlier in her career, Allison held roles at Fortress Investment Group and Bain Capital, where she focused on fund accounting, investor reporting, and financial analysis across real estate, private equity and venture capital platforms, gaining deep exposure to complex fund structures and global investment strategies. She began her career at PwC, where she developed a strong technical foundation in financial services alternatives and corporate taxation.

A graduate of Southern Methodist University Cox School of Business, where she earned her Master of Science in Accounting, Allison also holds a Bachelor of Arts in Psychology from Boston University. Allison and her husband, Matt, reside in Dallas with their son, Dean, and toy poodle, Penny.
